Objective: Explain patterns and landscapes of language, religion, ethnicity, and gender.

Warm UP

1. Think about a place that is special to you. What makes it remarkable?

Good memories of a place can affect how you interpret the geographic space. All humans associate feelings with locations, and geographers study these emotions because they help explain patterns found in cultural landscapes.

Sense of Place

- × Fill a geographic location with meaning - memories and feelings
- × Placemaking - process in which people collaborate to create a place where they can live, work, play, and learn
- × Creative use of a landscape → reflects the culture, feelings, experiences, and perceptions of the people who use it
- × Language, religion, ethnicity, and gender contribute to a person's sense of place which can be seen in the cultural landscape through various patterns

Patterns

- × Speech patterns can distinguish an area from other groups and shape the sense of place
 - × Dialect
 - × Vocabulary
- × Class, race, and ethnicity can also impact language patterns
 - × African American English
 - × Southern American English
 - × The “Queen’s” English
- × Regional patterns
 - × Language (code) switching
 - × Language preservation

Linguistic Patterns: Examples

Several terms still heard in western Pennsylvania, for instance, were imported by Scots-Irish immigrants during the 1700s: "poke" (a bag or sack), "redd" (tidy, as in "Please redd up your room"), "youns" (a second-person plural pronoun equivalent to the southern "ya'll"), "till" (to, as in "quarter till three") and "all" (as in "What all did she want?").

Likewise, enslaved people who arrived in South Carolina during the 1600s and 1700s brought with them many West African terms still used today: "yam" (sweet potato), "okra" (plant), "gumbo" (soup) and "goober" (peanut). "Moco," which meant "magic, witchcraft" in the West African language Fula, eventually morphed into our word "mojo" (magical power).

Religious Patterns

- × Organization and practice of a religion can influence the distribution
 - × Some religions appeal to a diverse group of people - widespread (universalizing religion)
 - × Other religions appeal to a specific ethnic group living in a specific place (ethnic religion)
- × Patterns may vary regionally
- × Sacred Sites

Religion

- × Significantly impacts cultural landscapes
- × Strong connection between religion and ethnicity → cultural identity → ex. Buddhism = Thailand; Hinduism = India
- × Practice of religion influences how and where the culture worships which then affects the design and architecture

THE TERM REDLINING, or red-lining, originates from the 1930s practice of color coding maps of cities based on different neighborhoods' eligibility to receive a loan or mortgage. The lowest ranked neighborhoods were often literally lined in red, and were almost always a community of color or other marginalized identity.

Ethnic Patterns

- × Patterns of ethnicity are deeply linked to religion, language, history
- × Ethnic groups → clusters → ethnic neighborhoods/enclaves
- × Colonialism
- × Apartheid & Segregation
- × Redlining

Gender

Gendered Spaces → Designed into the landscape to accommodate various gender roles

- × Supportive, positive, or inclusive
 - × Mexico City - pink buses
- × Restrictive or exclusive
 - × Some religious sects separate their congregates by gender
 - × Places where men are banned
 - × Places where women are banned

Unity & Division

- × Centrifugal force: divides a group of people
 - × Religion, language, ethnicity, and/or gender can also divide people in society
- × Centripetal force: unites a group of people
 - × Shared religion, language, ethnicity, or gender can create a shared sense of identity
